A / T absent, Willow Lane, Mitcham, 1992

"The landscape of production around the River Wandle in south London was once divided between lavender fields and watercress beds. After the second world war individual factories began to be established and the early premises accommodated printers and electric cable providers. Today the area has hundreds of commercial businesses, they include building contractors and associated trades, event services, trade waste companies, food manufacturers and providers, timber merchants, motor repair services, records storage and data management, printing services, engineering companies, IT services, suppliers of plastic products and materials, double glazing and window suppliers, furniture providers, removals and logistics, chemical distributors, water treatment solutions, training services, cleaning providers and more."
